

MT. LIZARD HEAD, MAJESTIC COLORADO PEAK, FALLS UNDER WEIGHT OF SNOW

Mt Lizard Head before the crash.

Denver, Colo., Dec. 28.—Mount Lizardhead, one of Colorado's grandest mountain peaks is a mass of ruins. Instead of a majestic peak, towering 14,160 feet into the clouds, there is now a jagged unnamed crag. With a crash that could be heard for miles, 2,000 feet of the top of the mountain collapsed on the morning of Dec. 22 and millions of tons of rock rolled down the mountain side.

The summit of the peak was a jagged spiral, and it is the theory of geologists that water from melting snow, together with the added weight of the heavy snows caused disintegration of the rock upon which the crest rested.

The reduced peak was the highest in the San Juan country, 23 miles from Telluride in the extreme southwestern part of Colorado.

—o—o—o—

Just as some of our dear prominent women had sent in their lists of the Twenty Greatest Women, with Madam Curie at the head, along comes that divorce scandal. It's awful!